

Over the years Parks has delivered speeches to raise money for the NACC. In 1969 a street was named for her in Detroit. She has received many awards—most notably the 1984 Elamoor Roosevelt Women of Courage Award. In 1989 she attended the White House Ceremony for the 25th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act, where she was a keynote speaker.

1. Why is Parks called the "mother of the civil rights movement"?<sup>2</sup>

2. Jo Ann Robinson recalled later that Parks was "disabled" and had "strong morals and high character." Why did that make her a good symbol to promote the bus boycott?

3. Explain in your own words what Parks's action meant to American history.

She joined the staff of a member of the U.S. House Southern Christian Leadership Conference. In 1965 she also helped the local office of the stresses and also helped the local office of the they had family. Rosa Parks made a living as a seamstress. After the boycott ended, no one would hire Parks. A year later she suffered a nervous breakdown. They were plagued by threatening phone calls. Even after the boycott ended, no one would hire Parks. She lost her job, and her husband was unable to work after suffering a nervous breakdown. However, she lost her right to be a leader.

However, on December 1, 1955, she was tried and took the bus. A white man got on the bus that day after the section reserved for whites was full. Parks and three other African Americans were told by the bus driver to give up their seats. Parks replied, "I don't think I should have to," she said. "Why do you push us around so?" The bus driver responded. Edgar Daniel Nixon—head of the local NAACP—and two lawyers paid a bond to secure Parks's release. Then Nixon asked if she would agree to appeal the case in order to challenge the segregation law. Her mother and husband feared for her safety, but she agreed to go ahead—if it will "do some good." Meanwhile, other activists in Montgomery seized on Parks's act of defiance. The "Montgomery Movement" had been ready for months to call for a boycott of the city bus line for its segregation and rude treatment of African Americans. Notched off Parks's arrest, Jo Ann Robinson of the WPC issued thousands of leaflets calling for the city's blacks to boycott the bus.

Rosa McCaulley had a difficult early life, as her parents separated and her small family struggled to live. She jiggled school with work to help her family. At age 19, she married Raymond Parks, who had been active in efforts to register African Americans to vote. For the next 20 years, she worked a variety of jobs. Beginning in 1943, she was a secretary of the Montgomery chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). When she could, Parks protested segregation laws. She refused to use drinking fountains or elevators set aside for African Americans. She often walked home from work rather than take trolley or bus.

Montgomery, Alabama, started a wave of protest in the 1950s—and launched the career of Martin deHavilland Segregation on the buses of

Rosa Parks (b. 1913) has been called the mother of the civil rights movement. Her quiet act of

"I didn't have any special fear. It was more of a relief to know . . . that I wasn't alone. If I was going to be fearful, it would have been as far back as I can remember, not just separate incidents."—Rosa Parks, recalling her emotions during the Montgomery bus boycott, 1998

Taking a Historic Stand by Sitting

AMERICAN LIVES Rosa Parks

Section 1